to England following heir successful tour of American links ast year they had a great deal to tell the went by the name of Bobby Jores and who had all the earmarks of becomever had seen. Since that time and the start of the golfing pilgrimage undertaken by George Duncan and Abe Mitchell the British followers of the game have had opportunity of watching this selfsame Bobby Jones perform,

Atlanta star. They did not have to, for quite evidently these two have had their certainly it will delight metropolitan golfers to know that the man who so

Possibly many Britons had satisfied themselves that the past summer had brought them face to face virtually with all there was of class in American amateur golf. They saw Jones and Evans and Guilford and Ouimet, Fownes, Paul Hunter, Woodle Platt and Preddy Wright. Previous experience had convinced them of the quality of the game of Bob Gardiner, while Jerome Travers and Heinrich Schmidt were by no means forgotten. It must have been something of a shock when along came Duncan and Mitchell with another string of names and the remark that this Sweetser is as likely to win a championship as anyssibly many Britons had satisfied

Another amateur who now is known to the British golfing public by name is Reginald M. Lewis of Greenwich. Duncan and Mitchell appear to think there is something uncanny about the habits of a player who will make four 2s in the course of a match, as Lewis did against them at Shuttle Meadow. It is to be supposed that Max Marston also received a word, for George and Abe cannot have forgotten the large part played by the Merion star in the first defeat suffered by the British pair on American soil.

Quite naturally the usually reticent Mitchell has always been induced to open up when on the subject of his retirement from the national open championship at Washington. Abe's explanation has been passed as satisfactory especially by this Britons who have visited these shores and been introduced to an American midsummer. The intense heat of Washington reduced him to utter fatigue, says Abe. More than that, Mitchell was still engrossed with the job of finding some suitable sartorial makeup that would fit the American climate, and yet not leave him hanican climate, and yet not leave him han-dicapped too badly by a sudden change from "suspenders" to a belt.
